Dropping Corn.

Sturdy, helpful, little Bill Trudges slow from hill to hill, Where the brown-backed corn-field lies Underneath the sweet May skies: Drops the seed with patient care, Just enough and none to spare— "One for the black-bird, one for the crow, One for the cut-worm and two to grow.

Robin, black-bird, saucy jay Sing and swing the livelong day, While the brooklet, in its joy, Laughs to scorn the plodding boy, "Cease this weary toil for bread." Slow he shakes his flaxen head— "One for the black-bird, one for the crow," One for the cut-worm and two to grow.

When the summer months are past, And December's cruel blast Chills each wild flower in its nook, Shuts the ice-doors of the brook; Then before the hearth-fire warm, Safe and sheltered from the storm, Little Bill will sing with pride. Little Bill will sing with pride, While the bannock browns beside: "One for the blackbird, one for the crow, One for the cut-worm and two to grow

SOME OF THE OBLIGATIONS WHICH ARE IMPOSED UPON THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

An Eloquent Address Before the Med-W. M. Grier, D. D., President of Erskine College.

mons every endowment, and every attainment to a steady, earnest, and resolute activity.

It is then something to stand pledged, by every worthy consideration, whether of duty or a noble ambition, to a life-work. This pledge you have made. Whatever may have been the influences which affected and decided your choice, whether it was your home surroundings, your education, or some accidental circumstance, (as some call it, a deeper thought might reveal it as a Providential indication,) the fact, the important fact, is that you have entered upon a service which has but one discharge. All other worldly plans and schemes are to be subordinate to your professional claims.

May I venture to hint at some of those obligations which your profession imposes upon you and which attach to it in all circumstances?

(I.) THIS OBLIGATION BINDS YOU TO THE

without price. This is to walk very closely in subtlest questions of matter, force and life. The very term "physician," of Greek derivation, signifies primarily a physicist. And while the word has undergone a marked process of specialization it still holds its root idea, and points unmistably and imperatively to a study of nature's laws, both in their reach of an analysis of the still holds its root idea, and points unmistably and imperatively to a study of nature's laws, both in their reach of an analysis of the still holds its root idea, and points unmistably and in the third of the state of the still holds its root idea, and perverted action. (III.) This suggests another important professional obligation—one which grows out of bottles labelled with mysterious symbols, a pair of saddle-bags and a roadcart make up the full equipment of one with whom, in no mean sense, are the issues of life and death. While no one has ever yet mastered his professional obligation—one which grows out of MORAL REFORM.

If there be such a relation, then you have a definite position to take you have a While no one has ever yet mastered his profession, it has been abundantly demonstrated in all the professions that the students are the permanently successful men. The studious minister outlasts the popular one. The temptations to an easy-going indolence will need to be steadily resisted. Your knowledge of many things of which your neignbors are ignorant, especially as that knowledge robes itself in the technicalities of a deau language, will give you some pre-eminence which you may prefer lazily to enjoy rather than deserve. There is an ancient parable which has its lesson for the old as well as the young: "A certain King instructed his son in the art of governing men. The great art,' he said, 'is to make the people believe that the King knows and pursued into its wide ramifications invites and quickens to further investigation. Take the following description of a distinguished surgeon: "He felt it a glorious thing to be able to rescue a patient from present suffering or impending danger, when everything else had failed, by the achievement of a successful surgical operation. He loved, by close investigation and careful comparison with all his previous experience, to match himself with the most difficult cases. He carefully prepared himself, even in the minutest points, for the difficulties he had to encounter, and then, with equal skill and firmness, with sparkling eye and dilating faculties, more like a warrior in the lists, his courage aroused with the danger, and his pulse stirred with the energy of strife," he gave himself to his task. Though not written originally of him, yet how true is all this of one of your own Alumni; a man honored with rare distinctions by two Continents, yet not more honored than lamented; a man who combined remarkable simplicity, modesty and the thoroughgoing conscientiousness of sincere piety with wonderful skill as a surgeon. Every Carolinian, no, I will not limit it, every man who appreciates the high merit which commands success points with just pride to the name of Dr. Marion Simms.

It is possible, however, to carry this enthusiasm, laudable as it is, to an extreme. It is possible to set a higher value upon the consistent development of some great pathological principle than the life of a patient. This sons from the minute of the peril of what is sometimes detected the "sclentific method," and we cannot shut our expects to the fact that you may be tempted to depreciate that which will not subtuit our eyes to the fact that you and the supernative methods, and that the spiritual and the supernative methods, and the supernative methods, and the supernative methods, Lord Bacon in his "Maxims of the Law" wrote: "I hold every man to be a debtor to his profession; from the which, as men of course do seek to receive countenance and profit, so ought they of duty to endeavor themselves, by way of amends, to be a help and organized the physician should "cherish an honest pride in his profession, should desire to do non it, to elevate it in the mental scale, to add to its scientific advancement, and to give to it his best powers of mind and heart." It is something to have chosen a profession—to have come out of the perpiexity of doubt and indecision into the clear light of a fixed, settled purpose. One of the gravest questions that confronts a young man when he assumes the responsibilities of citizenship is, What am I took o? What is the special work in which I am to engage? Upon what pursuit am I took pend the energies of my nature in the years that are to come? Whether he appreciates it or not it is a solemn moment when he gives a final answer to such questions. That answer concentrates upon a single object, the desire, the hopes and efforts of a lifetime. It summons every endowment, and every attainment to a steady, earnest, and resolute activity.

It is then something to stand pledged, by ev-

(I.) THIS OBLIGATION BINDS YOU TO THE LIFE OF A STUDENT.

This is true and, I believe I will say as true, of the country as the city doctor. The science of medicine in its essential features, without any reference to special forms of disease, involves some of the profoundest and subtlest questions of matter, force and life. The very term "physician," of Greek derivations, significe, mitmeilly a physicist. And

"Quinque medici tres athei." But we recognize

It is possible, however, to carry this asm, handable as it is, to an extreme. It is possible to set a higher value upon the consistent development of some great pathological principle than the life of a patient. This dearest earthly possession and most sacred gift may be sacrified in devotion to some professional dictum. We have read of a monk who persistently practiced lithotomy. He was remarkably successful—in killing his patients. When remonstrated with by one of the fathers, he replied: "It is my business to cure the patient.

The only true enthusiasm is that which imples to a profound acquaintance with the great principles of your profession, and which feels obliged in many cases to be content with a merely tentative method. To ignore the fact that in very many cases the data upon which you are to base your method of treatment are very uncertain; to forget that it is unspeakably better sometimes to hasten slowly than to prescribe blindly; this, we say, is to expose yourselves to the charge of a criminal zeal and it is as well to disregard the soundest maxims of experience.

(II) Your profession imposes also

AN OBLIGATION TO A LARGE CHARITY.

Suffering always appeals to our sympathy and help. It is the mute petition fer, the silent pleader which in its weakness, its amaciation and visible decline, begs not for gold or silver, but for some labels and the carth—why not be of the earth? And the farmer boy whose first teacher was a pious mother, and on whose lap he had often a principle and the read principle of the carth—why not be of the earth? And the farmer boy whose first teacher was a pious mother, and on whose lap he had often appears the data of the read principle of the carth—why not be of the earth? And the farmer boy whose first teacher was a pious mother, and on whose lap he had often appears the farmer boy whose first teacher was a pious mother, and on whose lap he had often appears the carth—why not be of the earth?

And the farmer boy whose first teacher was a pious mother, and on whose lap he had often fallen asleep as he drowsily lisped nis evening prayer; and the plain mechanic, the busy shop girl, the intelligent merchant, the man of affairs and of letters, are all touched by the dreadful contagion. In our newspapers, our circulating libraries, on the cars, in the street, in the literary club, in the scientific convention, in the very eulogies and obituaries of the dead, we imbibe the subtle poison. Our business, our social and our religious life feel the effect of this steady assault on the awful verities of that which is unseen and eternal. The powerful moral restraint which they create is immensely weakened by doubt and un-The powerful morful restraint which they treat is immensely weakened by doubt and uncertainty. The sacred citadel of faith, the Church has not escaped unharmed. These constant sneers at the power of prayer, this constant assertion and laudation of the reign of law, with all its inflexible necessities, its unalterable uniformities and continuities, have stolen upon us in our closets and quenched the fervent petition ere it was blown from our lips. Oh, for the earnest, simple faith of our Puritan fore athers, who walked with God and to whom all things were possible! Called as you are to submit every doctrine caned as you are to submit every doctrine of your profession, every remedy to some definite, tangible proof, I beseech you shun that desolating philosophy which would narrow one's belief to sight and sense. Hear the words of one who is no sectarian doctrinaire, but who is recognized as a profound philosophor. "There is no parrower man, often none pher: "There is no narrower man, often nonpher: "There is no narrower man, often hole more bigoted, than he who thinks that Science is all. With his spiritual undeveloped, self-complacent from defect, plodding and sneer-ing in his little round of uniformities, he is but half a man. You may see him where sci-entific associations gather, with his plant box across his shoulder and his geologic hammer is his band on his way to spend the Lord's in his hand, on his way to spend the Lord's day as a naturalist, instead of honoring him by spiritual worship with His people, and as by spiritual worship with His people, and as he goes he shall meet a woman, aged and blind, who can see no plants, who cannot see even him, but whose lips move in silent pray-er, and he shall think of her only as a poor the greatest of natural history, and he may be the greatest of naturalists and she may be the least in the Kingdom of Heaven, but she is greater than he." This is the victory that overcometh even our faith.
